Letter to the editor of the Charleston, WV, Gazette

By devoting much of your story to a commentary by the deputy Consumer Advocate, the Gazette has mischaracterized both Verizon's acquisition of MCI and the state of telecom competition in West Virginia (Verizon-MCI merger may hurt customers, critic says, Feb. 15).

In today's data/broadband world, with long distance rapidly disappearing as a stand-alone business, MCI's leadership recognized that the world is changing. Because of MCI's strength in IP technology and enterprise markets (areas in which Verizon wants to expand), it made sense for them to enter into a deal Verizon. In fact, it is a win-win proposition for the companies and their customers.

MCI is not an aggressive competitor in local telecommunications in West Virginia, but many other players are. Competition for enterprise and smaller business customers is particularly fierce, and consumers have a wide range of technological options to choose from, like cable- and Internet-based phone service, wireless, e-mail, text and instant messaging.

These new and emerging technologies compete for consumers' communications needs that once were met solely by the wired telephone network. The deputy Consumer Advocate is wrong to disregard these technologies that have irreversibly reshaped the telecom marketplace.

We have entered a new age, where competition and consumer choice—not the number of lawyers per square foot in a hearing room—define the new telecom market. The Verizon-MCI deal creates a strong competitor and will help transform our company into a national broadband service provider. It will enable Verizon to bring advanced communications services to West Virginia businesses and residences faster and more economically. And that's good for West Virginians.
