According to Diebold CEO Andy Mattes

Diebold is one of the world's largest ATM machine-makers, and it's about to get even bigger. CEO Andy Mattes tells Fortune's Susie Gharib that Diebold will soon double its revenues when it closes a deal to buy its ATM competitor, Germany's Wincor Nixdorf. The $2 billion deal could even catapult the 156-year old American manufacturer onto the Fortune 500.

Buy why expand the ATM business at a time when people are using debit cards, credit cards, and services like Apple Pay and Google Wallet? Mattes makes the case that today's ATMs are not the cash and dash machines that we're used to seeing. Mattes says they are sophisticated, high-tech machines that can do 90% of what a human teller can perform, and can connect the physical world of cash with the digital world of cash.

Transcript of Interview with CEO Andy Mattes for Fortune.com

Susan Gharib: Andy, you're soon going to close on a very big deal, that you are acquiring a German ATM company. Why is this so important for your company?

Andy Mattes: It's the biggest deal in the 156-year history of Diebold. We're basically doubling our business. We're combining a company that's the market leader in the Americas, Diebold, with a company that has a leading position in EMEA, Wincor Nixdorf, and it's going to create a powerhouse in our industry, it's going to create a great partner for our customers, who are transforming themselves and who want a strong partner to help them and lead them through that transformation.

- Susan Gharib: Well, you know, when you do look at the numbers, you are just about doubling your revenues and this would bump up Diebold into the Fortune 500, so does this size give you more of an advantage over your archrival, NCR?
- Andy Mattes: Look, you've got to grow your business. You have to make sure that you get a bigger, better seat at the table. Our customers is the who's who in the banking world around the globe. They want a strong, viable partner that helps them through the transformation that they are going through, and this acquisition just gives us that springboard to be such a much better partner for them.
- Susan Gharib: You talk about your customers being the biggest banks, but we also know that those very customers are reducing their number of branches, we know that Millennials are doing most of their banking on their cellphones, so make a case for how do ATMs fit in this new digital economy we're in?
- Andy Mattes: Think about it this way. It's not your cash and dash type of ATM. It's a machine that does about 90% what the human teller can perform today. It's a machine that can connect the physical worlds of cash with the digital worlds of cash. It's a machine where you can put money into the system just as easily as you take money out of the system, and of all groups in our country that has the highest usage of cash, believe it or not, it's the Millennials.
- Susan Gharib: So, what impact does things like Apple Pay and Google Wallet have on Diebold?
- Andy Mattes: They're actually a great ecosystem enhancer for us. It gives a great opportunity to drive new innovation. This weekend, there's going to be the National Retail Show here in New York City, where we showcase a new application where you can actually go shopping, as a retail consumer in your store, in the app, in the digital app, of that store, you take a picture of the merchandise, you go to the checkout counter, and you just press button and you're done, you've paid, so you combine these technologies, the technical term that's used in the industry is called omni channel, connecting all different types of payments. It's a software play, it's a services play, and it's a huge opportunity for Diebold.
