MR. MIKUEN: Well, good morning, everybody. I'm just going to talk a couple of minutes about the transaction and some do's and don'ts. A lot of it is really common sense. So we are in the period between sign and close. You might say, well, I saw mid-2019 and why does it take so long to close? Four to six months. There are a couple of reasons for that. The two main approvals that we need is one, is the SEC. So we are issuing our shares. So effectively, the SEC has to go through a review process. The most delicate part of that is creating pro forma financials. So what the company would look like on a combined basis. That's going to take many in this room, on Todd and the accounting teams, a lot of time and effort. The SEC goes through that painstakingly. And so that is part of the process. We also need shareholder approval. So at some point you'll see a very voluminous document -- well, online, you'll see it, not in paper anymore. It will be hundreds of pages. 2

It will describe the merger. It will describe the valuation, the background of the merger. And that's part of the process that is required by the SEC when you need a shareholder vote. So for our shareholders, we need approval as does the L3 shareholders. So that is one of the longer work streams. The other one is regulatory approvals. The merger requires what is called Hart-Scott-Rodino in the US. But there are also some other jurisdictions that require a look at the transaction to make sure it doesn't stifle competition in certain areas. So that process in many circumstances is now the long pole and there are transactions now that are a year or longer. We don't think this will go anywhere near there and we're hoping we can get it within the four to six month period. So what does it mean during this period, what can we do? And the bottom line is we are still separate companies. For most in this room, it's not going to impact very much what you do. It's ordinary course, arm's-length. If you do have interaction with L3 on teaming 3 or transactions, you need to continue to treat them separately and they need to continue to treat us separately. Many in the Corporate and certain other areas are going to be providing lots of information, whether it is for integration -- We still have some ongoing due diligence that is reciprocal. And so, if you're getting information requests, that should all be funneled through the channels that we will come out with some more guidance on. But again, mostly ordinary course and then as I mentioned, the integration team will be the one that will interface, be the go-between between us and L3 and vice versa. Okay, a couple of do's and don'ts. Really, they just follow what I just said about treating each other as separate independent companies. We are permitted to do due diligence. And that is something that is going to happen and we're going to continue to do that. Again, it will be controlled on how we structure it. And we can absolutely, together with plan for the integration. We can prepare and look at the IT systems and all of the other areas that build into the synergies as we go forward. There will be limited site visits and a whole series of integration planning. That is all permitted. Again, it will be guided by the integration team. So if you get requests, you need to make sure that you are aware of the integration team so that if you get calls from people who aren't involved in integration, you should ask the question: Is this authorized contact? Am I able to provide you the information? So it's really more of a process. And on the right you see the prohibited activities. While it would be very tempting to say that we are bidding on something that they are, shouldn't we do it jointly, because we know we are going to close. Well, the answer is that it is illegal to do that. We can't do that. It's called gun-jumping. So we really have to be careful on bids and proposals and places where we are interacting with customers. It has to be very 5 circumspect and limited and there are a lot of questions already coming up to the teams and you can't talk about specific pricing and the like. So the two main things on this are we can't be exchanging confidential or competition sensitive information without going through a very rigorous clean room process. So, that's the general lay of the land. 6
