Turn the other Chico
Activist pushes on U.S. retailer's open door
By Jennifer Saba
26 May 2016

Barington Capital is pushing through an open door. The activist hedge fund wants two board seats and costs slashed at struggling U.S. women's clothing retailer Chico's. It owns just a tiny stake in the $1.5 billion company, which is already shaking things up with its own new slate of qualified directors. This brand of investor aggression is overdone.

Started back in 1983 in Sanibel Island, Florida, as a single shop to sell Mexican folk art, the company has expanded into 700 outlets with its namesake brand, White House Black Market and Soma, mainly targeting middle-aged women. Like many retailers of late, Chico's is losing shoppers. Sales fell 4 percent in the first quarter, the company said this week. The shares have tumbled nearly 40 percent over the past year in a flat market.

Chico's brought in Wal-Mart Stores veteran Shelley Broader to run the show in October. She has embarked on a plan to mine customer data in a bid to trim some $25 million in marketing expenses. The company also is following the smart corporate-governance fashion, by inviting shareholders to vote on whether to have all directors face an election together each year.

These initiatives so far have failed to impress investors, including Barington. Chief Executive James Mitarotonda wants a board seat alongside a former Macy's executive he also has nominated. It's an assertive move for a firm with less than 2 percent of the shares in a relatively small company. What's more, Chico's has put up candidates from Hudson's Bay and Wal-Mart.

It sounds like Broader is all ears. The retailer has been meeting with Barington and even considered and interviewed some of the hedge fund's board choices. Chico's has a new CEO who is shaking things up and embracing outside ideas. Running a proxy fight at this point is the sort of thing that is more likely to hurt than help the broader cause of shareholder activism.
